HELEN MOLLER and her classical dancers performed the Greek play "Orpheus" recently at Martha Leonard's Brookside Theatre at Mount Kisco. The setting and all the details were strictly in accordance with Greek requirements as understood by modern classical dancers. The performance was given in the open air, the theatre was designed after a Greek model and the performers wore graceful white robes and discarded shoes and hosiery. The theatre stands beside a small brook and is surrounded by grassy slopes. So altogether the surroundings were as attractive as could be asked. The spectacle also was pretty, as may be seen from the photographs reproduced here. There were five solo dances by Miss Moller. In chronological order they were "The Mourner's Dance," "Dance of the Furies" and three in the Elysian Fields. Later Miss Moller appeared in a dance with seven other young women carrying garlands of roses.
